THE WAR IN THE WEST

The object of this campaign was to control the Mississippi, which would split the Confederacy by preventing men and supplies from Arkansas, Louisiana and Texas from reaching the Eastern battlefields. When the object was accomplished, Union troops would turn eastward, win the Allegheny passes in Tennessee, and from this "side door" strike at the heart of the Confederacy.

Scene of the Western campaign

The First Line. A strong Confederate line began at the Mississippi and extended eastward along the northern border of Tennessee. Where this line crossed the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers were Forts Henry and Donelson. The first Union attack was aimed at these forts, which prevented gunboats from going upriver to the rear of the Confederate position.

Thanks largely to the gunboats, Fort Henry was battered to pieces; then Donelson was besieged and forced to surrender with its garrison of 15,000 men (February, 1862), compelling the whole

FLORIDA

To capture the place was a difficult task, for it was defended by strong forts and by a number of ships of war.

The command of the expedition against it was given to David G. Farragut. In April the fleet began the bombardment of the forts. Six days and nights without intermission shells were thrown from huge mortars into the defenses, but they did not succeed in destroying the works or driving the garrison out. Farragut then planned to run by the forts, attack the fleet above them, proceed up the river, and take the city. This was successfully accomplished. New Orleans passed into the hands of the Federal forces, April, 1862.

As already suggested, the fall and winter * of 1861-'62 had been spent in quietness by the Army of the Potomac.

The peninsula campaign.

In the spring McClellan decided to change his base of operations and to transfer his forces to the peninsula between the James River and the York. He moved leisurely up the peninsula, hindered somewhat by the enemy, and especially balked by a daring offensive move made by "Stonewall" Jackson down the Shenandoah Valley. This valley was peculiarly advantageous ground for the enemy.

It furnished a safe avenue for raids into Maryland or feints against Washington.

forces pursued, they were led constantly away from Richmond.

McClellan pushed on and threw his left wing across the Chickahominy at Fair Oaks. This portion of the army was attacked by Johnston, who had managed to collect a large force for the protection of the Confederate capital. Unsupported by the right wing, which was on the other side of the river, the National left was nearly crushed. Night ensued, and the next morning the Confederate army was met and repulsed. McClellan pushed his army still nearer Richmond. By the end of

The Federal forces suffered greatly from the swampy and unhealthy condition of the peninsula.

McClellan remained in command of the Army of the Potomac. McClellan's plan of capturing Richmond, however, was given up and the forces of McDowell, Banks, and Fremont were united under the name of the Army of Virginia, with General Pope as commander (§ 447).
